As for my photos, I now shoot only in Camera Raw mode, which captures all available light and detail info available to the camera sensor. I have learned the tricks to photograph more stars than are visible to the naked eye. It involves taking a series of photos at highest digital ISO speed with the fastest lens available (f2.8 or better) on wide angle mode. This enables the camera to capture the faintest of light. Then to make them sharp you need to stack the series of images together in computer to make the image as sharp as possible. The computer aligns the stars together without repeating them. Additional sharpening and enhancement techniques bring out the detail and color that is in the image already. This is the same process that NASA uses on their powerful telescopes to peer into the universe.

Shots of the moon are done the same way. The trick is to have short exposures of 15 seconds or less for stars, otherwise you start to get movement known as star trails.
